

Alexis O'Hara SQUEEEQUE! The Improbable Igloo 2009 Installation view Courtesy the Blackwood Gallery and Justina M. Barnicke Gallery (Image 1/5)

SEE IT

Sound Artists Raise The Volume At U Of T

Justina M. Barnicke Gallery, Toronto & Blackwood Gallery, Mississauga January 16 to March 10, 2013

By Nives Hajdin

POSTED: JANUARY 25, 2013

Sound is all around us, even when our environment is seemingly silent. Changing frequencies, white noise and echoes are sounds that are often overlooked, as are electronic beeps, the communicative “sound” of sign language and even some attempts at lyrical expression.

Curator Christof Migone explores these relationships in his latest exhibition, “Volume: Hear Here,” a joint presentation of two University of Toronto galleries: the Blackwood Gallery and the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery.

Migone’s curatorial framework stems from his own status as a practicing sound artist, and it successfully disrupts traditional notions of the gallery space by way of sound-based interventions that welcome viewers to interact with their surroundings.

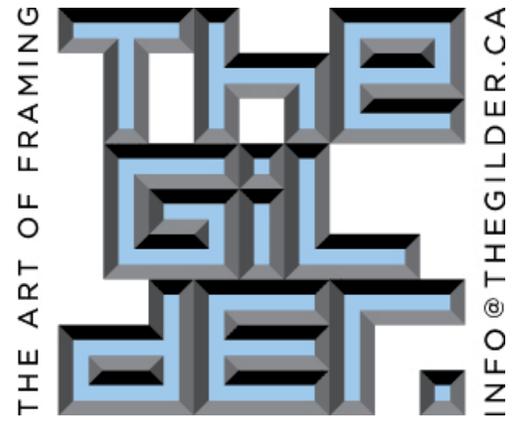

A number of works are completely mesmerizing, including Rafael Lozano-Hemmer’s Last Breath, in which a respiratory tube is connected to a machine on one end and to an expanding and retracting paper bag on the other, thereby simulating the process of breathing quite convincingly. Indeed, Lozano-Hemmer has written that this is a machine “designed to store and circulate the breath of a person forever.”

Pieces such as Alexis O’Hara’s SQUEEEQUE! The Improbable Igloo and Darsha Hewitt’s Electrostatic Bell Choir are heavily reliant on the participation of the viewer to be set into motion—an intimidating expectation that proves rewarding if you take the time to engage with each piece. O’Hara’s igloo, constructed mainly of speakers, invites you to project your voice into the hanging microphones within, while Hewitt’s television sets are triggered by a motion sensor in a pitch-black room and generate enough static to ring a series of bells in front of each screen.

There are a number of other unexpected, yet transfixing, installations, including Neil Klassen’s deliberate refusal of music in Requiem and Ruin #1, featuring a trumpet covered in black tar that seeps onto the gallery floor. The exhibition is rounded out by works from Marla Hlady, Dave Dymont, Ryan Park and other artists.

Visually and aurally, "Volume: Hear Here" is an immersive experience that beckons the viewer not just to observe, but to listen as well.

and SAVE over $15.00
CANADIANART

REEL ARTISTS
CANADIAN ART FOUNDATION
FILM FESTIVAL

FESTIVAL PASSES ON SALE JANUARY 25-
FEBRUARY 1 ONLY

get yours now

Reel Artists
CANADIAN ART FOUNDATION
FILM FESTIVAL

Related Articles

SEE IT

Steve Bates: On The Sound Of Time

Amid the many distractions of an information-saturated world, ...

REVIEW

Sometimes Always: Sound Effects

Obsolete and on-the-way-out audio technologies find new life ...

REVIEW

Sound Waves, Microscopes Bring Science-Fair Feel To Grunt Gallery

Enter Grunt Gallery these days and you're likely ...

Comment on this article

Name: (required)

Email: (will not be published): (required)

Sign up for the free Canadian Art Weekly newsletter

Email Address

advertise

subscribe/renew

donate

buy tickets

sitemap

faq

rss feeds

privacy policy